If so which ? (5 responses)

A website for the project would have been beneficial if set-up before the meeting. It would have been a good reference for future info on the project status/outcomes/deliverables etc. I personally think numbers matter a lot. Reporting and statistical data (define measurable parameters to quantify outputs) are very important (maybe the *only* way) to assess the outcomes. A clear definition of the expectations should also be made available. My modest opinion is that this will also help a better coordination and avoid a duplication of efforts.

I missed the second day

Everything was clear.

The project application submitted by PLUS has not been shared yet with the project partners.

Detailed info with regard to the input required from each partner, the estimated men days and the number of participants from each institution with regard to training and study tours.

Is there anything else you would like to add or share? (4 responses)

A mailing-list can be created to contact and inform/gather contributions from different stakeholders of the project. A virtual meeting place (even though less effective than face-to-face meeting) would also be cost-effective and comfortable for those project members whom also have other duties in their respective institutions.

I would like some details regarding the meetings that will be organized in each partner university.

Communication has been very efficient and productive.

A big thank you to all who participated in organization.

What would you recommend for future events? (7 responses)

to plan enough time to exchange information between partners

Even though it is the responsibility of the partners to inform their representing staff, please do send the relevant information at least one week in advance, so these people (whom in most cases are not QA experts) can have enough time to study them.

materials ahead, more clarity on the project engagement by the partners

Be informed in advance of the training content and topics

Being always in contact in order to be efficient

Continuation of this process and method of communication and support provision.

Given the high workload of all persons involved in this project, I would suggest that future events take place during the last working days of the week, preferably Thursday and Friday.
